

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN RIPON, WISCONSIN, WHERE REPUBLICAN PARTY WAS CONCEIVED AT PRELIMINARY
MASS MEETING HELD FEBRUARY 28, 1854

setts, attorney general; James Campbell of Pennsylvania, postmaster-general; James C. Dobblins of North Carolina, secretary of navy; Robert McClelland of Michigan, secretary of the interior.

In Congress there were but four members west of the Missouri river who could vote. They were from California and were Senator William A. Gwin, who had been elected with Gen. John C. Fremont in 1849 and who took their seats September 10, 1850. Gwin had been a representative from Missouri in the twenty-seventh Congress, United States marshal for Mississippi, had built the custom house in New Orleans and a member of the constitutional convention of California in 1849.

The junior senator from California was John B. Weller, who had served in the lower house of congress from Ohio in the twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth congress, afterwards governor of California and still later minister to Mexico.

In the house Milton S. Latham was one of the representatives. He declined a re-election and was elected governor in 1859 and in January, 1860, was elected United States senator to succeed David C. Broderick, who was mortally wounded in a duel with the chief justice of the California supreme court and died September 16, 1859.

The senior representative was James A. McDougall, who had been the first attorney general of the state and who afterwards was elected United States senator, serving from 1861 to 1867 and who died in the latter year at his old home in Albany, New York.

The delegates in congress from the territories in the West were Joseph Lane of Oregon, who was afterwards a candidate for vice president on the ticket with John C. Breckenridge; John M. Bernhisel was the delegate from Utah, Columbia A. Lancaster from Washington, John W. Whitfield from Kansas, Napoleon B. Giddings from Nebraska, Jose M. Gallegos of New Mexico, who had been a member of the legislative assembly of the Republic of Mexico from the state of New Mexico.

When the party was born the senators from Wisconsin were Henry M. Dodge and Isaac P. Walker. Dodge was the first governor of Wisconsin territory taking office July 4, 1836, resigning as Colonel of the First United States Dragoons on his appointment by President Andrew Jackson. One of the three representatives from that state in the house was John B. Macy, who lost his life by the burning of the steamer Niagara on Lake Michigan, September 24, 1856.

When the party was born there were giants in congress. In the Senate were Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, Charles Sumner and Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, Lewis Cass of Michigan, Hamilton Fish and William H. Seward of New York, Salmon P. Chase and Ben Wade of Ohio, William Pitt Fessenden of Maine, James A. Bayard of Delaware, Robert Toombs of Georgia, Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, Jesse D. Bright of Indiana, Judah P. Benjamin and John Slidell of Louisiana, Sam Houston of Texas. In the house were Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana, John C. Breckenridge of Kentucky, Thomas H. Benton of Missouri, Lewis D. Campbell of Ohio, Joshua R. Giddings of Ohio, Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, Galusha A. Grow of Pennsylvania, who during his long career in public life, was elected to Congress once by unanimous vote and once in 1896 by the largest plurality ever given up in any state in the Union to any candidate for office, his plurality being 297,446.

Of the men who were present when the Republican party was born all have gone to their reward, the last survivor, Captain O. H. McCauley, and from whom the facts for this story was obtained, passed away a year ago in Denver at the age of 86 years. It might be remarked that the last survivor of the Philadelphia convention of 1856, the first Republican national convention and which nominated John C. Fremont of California for president and William H. Dayton of New Jersey for vice president, Daniel W. Gamble, who was building inspector for Salt Lake City, died at Price, Utah, four years ago. The school building is still standing in Ripon.
